Exhibition at Bowdoin College.

The annual Exhibition at Bowdoin College, was made in the meeting house in Brunswick, last Tuesday. It commenced a little after eleven o'clock. A procession was formed from the chapel. The exercises were interspersed with music. Of these exercises, the salutatory was remarkable for the purity of the Latin, and the spirit of the performance; and although upon a mythological subject, and in a language sacred to scholars, it was rendered extremely interesting by the eloquence with which it was pronounced. The comparison, instituted between the moral tendency of the Iliad and that of the Aeneid, was conceived with just ideas of the epic, and executed in quite a superior style. Of the two poems, one was a beautiful specimen of descriptive poetry, and in the other, though imperfectly heard, there were striking proofs of poetical genius. The oration upon the reverence of antiquity gave an animated account of the abuse of the passion, and made a charming display of the excellence of the principle. The valedictory was no less honorable to the talents and studies of the speaker. There was also an ingenious dissertation upon the variety of language, and a profound disquisition into the theory of winds. The other performances were remarkably good, among which it would be difficult to forget the part upon the comparative effect of poetry and eloquence, which was handsomely written and gracefully spoken. It is unnecessary to say any thing more than that the character of the exhibition was such as to justify the title of the principal performers to the praise of being the best class ever educated at this institution.

JETHRO—No. 6.

THE surest test of religion, in the choice of rulers, is afforded by the prevalence of correct principles and habits among the people. How often do we hear it asserted, that Republicanism is to be sustained only by general virtue; and that religion is the only genuine source of virtue? But, how little regard is paid to these sentiments, even by those who make the loudest professions of patriotism. When shall we see deeply impressed upon the heart, this important truth, that, without being good men, it is impossible to be good citizens. Immoral, irreligious persons, with all they can say or do in the superficial character of mere voters, will never be able to counteract the influence of their example as members of a free and Christian Community. It is true they may assist in bringing good men into office; yet they do not encourage them as good men; but are ready to drop them, whenever another instrument appears more favorable to the views of party.

Would you therefore use your influence for furnishing the civil departments with men, having the "fear of God before their eyes," do every thing in your power to promote the public institutions of religion. An enlightened and faithful Clergy, is the highest and firmest tower which defends the walls of a free community. What sort of friends to country then are they, who withhold or grudge a small tax for the support of this useful and venerable body of men; when they readily part with a much larger sum for an idle, or even a criminal gratification? What apology shall be made for such as encourage religious and political Pretensions, who, with the specious pretence of liberty and true Christian zeal, pursue a course tending to destroy the natural and necessary distinctions of society. The inconsistency of such conduct appears from considering that these distinctions are constantly supposed and countenanced in the word of God; as is evident from the numerous moral and religious precepts in which they are involved. It is, however, necessary to observe here, that such of this class as look farthest beyond the passing moment, by no means aim at a permanent equality; but, would avail themselves of changes apparently terminating in this state, for bringing the political scale, at last, to the greatest possible preponderance in their own favor. This inference seems fairly to arise from the part they have taken in the affairs of a nation, whose history, when it shall be stripped of that familiarity which belongs to actual observation, and cotemporary knowledge, will seem incredible. As if the world had not been already sufficiently astonished, we now behold the man who has erected a military despotism upon the ruins of an ancient dynasty, entering into affinity with a throne, which generals and armies, senators and consuls, and he himself the most conspicuous figure among them, have, for years, been trampling under their feet. Ye who have followed this "madman" through the rapid stages of his bloody career, with an interest, bordering upon adoration, allow me to suggest one short lesson—Be consistent. See if you can place together the discordant characters of Republican General in revolutionary times, and, when events favored elevation, First Consul, Emperor, King. And lastly, with respect to religion, of Mussulman in Egypt, Catholic in France, and throughout the world, say thing, that might best secure the views of absolute and universal domination.

At Biddeford Mr. Jonathan T. G. to Miss Margaret Hill, daughter of Jeremiah Hill, Esq.

DIED.

Near Newbern, (N. C.) Edw. T. a lad, aged about 17 years; unfortunately murdered by Capt. Edward Tinker and Mr. Peter Durand. It appears that T. with D. and the lad, took a vessel lately to Baltimore, loaded with sugar and coffee, and sold it for cash; when T. insured his vessel with a very valuable cargo to Newbern, and failed in ballast; but that when near Hatteras bank he landed the money, and sunk the vessel by boring holes in her bottom; proceeded to Newbern (with D. and the lad) swore to a protest that the vessel was lost in consequence of her age, &c. that the money went to the bottom, and that two men were drowned in diving for it: The lad though tutored, equivocated in his testimony, and finally told the whole truth of the affair; which so exasperated T. and D. that they took him down the river, and shot him, and tied stones to his feet, but his body floated and was found: T. and D. were taken up on suspicion, and committed to goal; and D. (who is T's brother-in-law) under a hope of pardon, has made full confession of the murder; &c. They will be tried at the next term of the Court.
